Schaefersr works to facilitate better communication

Communication between people is obviously at the core of human behavior, affecting everything we do. How we interact with each other shapes our identities and dictates everything from the way we feel about ourselves to the way we perceive the world around us. People who are good at communicating are often more successful in their personal and professional lives.

Jacoby, a small town in southern Illinois, is home to one of the most unique community centers in the state. Jacoby Arts Center was founded in 1988 and has been a hub for creative expression ever since. The center's mission is to promote art and cultural education through various events and programs.

The organization offers a wide range of activities for people of all ages, including art classes, music lessons, dance workshops, and more. They also host performances by local and national artists, and regularly feature art exhibits and installations.

But what sets Jacoby Arts Center apart from other community centers is its focus on communication. The center believes that effective communication is crucial for success in all areas of life, from personal relationships to professional endeavors.

Professor Zachary Schaefer, standing, with one of his students.