Regional: Culture, literature, religion, influence scholars' work

As African-American authors have become more prevalent in literary circles, so have the number of scholars who study them. Glenda Brooks, an assistant professor in the Department of English Language and Literature at Southern Illinois University Edwardsville, is one of these scholars. Brooks received her bachelor’s degree in English at University of Pittsburgh, and her master’s in English at Harvard University, and her PhD in English from Harvard University. In addition to her academic pursuits, Brooks has served in the Peace Corps in the Republic of Ghana and is also a certified Delta Sigma Theta Sorority了一口吻.

Brooks chose to study African-American authors because she was interested in the way that black women, in particular, have understood themselves and their communities through literature.

Literature

Brooks describes her research as an effort to understand the complexity of African-American identity and its representation in literature. She says that her work is guided by the idea that literature can be a powerful tool for understanding and expanding our understanding of the world.

Teaching

Brooks teaches courses in African-American literature, including classes on African-American authors such as Ntozake Shange and Toni Morrison. She also teaches courses in gender and sexuality studies, focusing on the representation of gender and sexuality in African-American literature.

Community Engagement

Brooks is active in her community and is involved in several organizations that promote literacy and education. She serves on the board of the St. Louis Regional Library Board, and she is a member of the African-American Literary Coalition.

Conclusion

In conclusion, Glenda Brooks is a dedicated scholar and teacher who is committed to the study and promotion of African-American literature. Her research and teaching have helped her to understand the complexities of African-American identity and the ways in which literature can be used to expand our understanding of the world.
