College presidents see glaze from the top

Dr. Aldemaro Romero Jr.
Letters from Academia

The university lost more than 20 percent. And the Indian booksellers, who buy books such as "The Saffron Trail," say the cut in its budget for higher education is a blow to their business. They are concerned that the public postsecondary education sector will have to make even more cuts to balance its books.

The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending. The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending. The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending. The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending. The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending. The cuts are coming. College presidents are working to cut costs, view more situations, and reduce the number of courses. Some colleges are asking students to pay for more of the costs of their education. College presidents are making plans to cut back on services and programs that are not essential to their mission. Some colleges are also looking to cut back on their capital spending.

Treasurer: Tax bills to be mailed soon

For the Intelligencer

"Before, taxpayers could only have their tax bill sent to a single address," said Prenzler. "Now, there are additional addresses that can be set up online. "It’s similar to how Americans are able to choose different accounts for their bills," she said. "It’s the same with our tax bills. You can have them sent to multiple addresses."

"The new online payment system will allow taxpayers to choose different payment options," she said. "They can choose to pay online, mail their payment, or pay in person at the tax office."

"The new online payment system is only for new accounts," she said. "For existing accounts, taxpayers will need to contact the tax office to change their payment options.

"We also encourage taxpayers to pay their bills online," she said. "It is faster and more convenient."

WALKS

Cougars Council sends well wishes

A colorful greeting card can help brighten a patient’s day. And when the card is handmade by an elementary student with a big heart, it’s even better. The card was made by the students of Edwardsville Primary School’s Cougar Council. The council consists of third-grade students elected by their classmates. The students who make the cards select a theme and then write a message of support and encouragement. The cards are then mailed to local hospitals and nursing homes.

"We wanted to make cards that would bring a smile to someone’s face," said Bill Tucker, Intelligencer editor. "We also wanted to show our appreciation for the hard work of the medical staff."

"The cards are a great way to show our support and appreciation," said Tucker. "We are happy to be able to help in this way.

Salute

Edwardsville American Legion Post 109

Edwardsville V.F.W. Post 1299

Dr. Aldemaro Romero Jr.

For the Intelligencer