Healthcare professionals are warning about the effects of these scandals on student mental health. According to the report, "The Impact of Campus Scandals on College Applications," a study of over 100 universities and colleges between 2001 and 2013 as measured by U.S. News and World Report. The report found that 69% of students who experienced four different scandals during their time in college reported feeling anxious or depressed about their academic performance. Over 37% of those students reported feeling so anxious that it affected their ability to participate in class or complete assignments.

The report also points out that the effect of these scandals on student mental health varies widely depending on the nature of the scandal. For example, scandals involving sexual assault or harassment were more likely to have a significant impact on students' mental health than those involving plagiarism or academic dishonesty.

In addition to the mental health impact, the report notes that these scandals also affect students' ability to apply to college. Students who experienced more than five scandals were 50% less likely to have applied to college. They also had fewer applications. The lowered ranking leads to even fewer students applying. After all, rankings influence the admissions process.

The report concludes that these scandals are a growing concern and that universities should take steps to prevent them from occurring and to mitigate their impact on students.

For the Intellectors

"There were 150 new students in the freshman class this year, and they're doing their best to fit in and succeed," said Professor Mark Thompson. "The post-apocalyptic season is tough, but we're doing our best to support our students and help them navigate this challenging time."
