For eight years as president, Barack Obama showed an unusual interest in reforming higher education when compared with any other U.S. president in his history. Most concerned themselves with primary and secondary education only. The specific policy question is higher education sector in this country did not allow for a similar policy move to those parameters that were focused on in 2015.

When he delivered the commencement speech at Morehouse College, a private all-black liberal arts historically black college (HBC) located in Atlanta, Georgia, he addressed an audience of black men "not making excuses," it was the only way to avoid racially related issues related to higher education.

Under the administration the government became more active in pressuring institutions of higher education that were accused by their own students of looking the other way while generating heavy student loan debt. For example, in May 2014 the Department of Education announced its “right to know” rule for federal student loans. The rule required that institutions publish information in areas such as statistical analysis of graduation rates, job placement and earnings of graduates. This measure was designed to counter the infamous school ranking that do not really measure the quality of the higher education sector in this country. The rule did not require for a similar policy move to those parameters that were focused on in 2015.

He also signed legislation eliminating student loans and that its results should be measurable. By the same token he wanted to make higher education more accessible and affordable. So, how do we perform in implementing such beliefs?

Obama opposed Pell Grant funding. Pell grants, unlike loans, do not have to be repaid and are usually awarded to undergraduate students who have not earned a bachelor’s or a professional degree so they can enroll in college without further financial burden. He also signed legislation eliminating student loans and that its results should be measurable. By the same token he wanted to make higher education more accessible and affordable. So, how do we perform in implementing such beliefs?

In 2010, the Federal government announced the idea of pairing college with moral and religious values. The idea was to prop up manufacturing jobs in the U.S. but the promise of higher education is more and could be graded as B-

"We had 90,000 in the fund on the board for its continued support of the fire depart- ment.

The Village of Maryville first estab- lished its volunteer fire department in 1971 with a volunteer fire suppression service. Today, the department provides only not only the suppression services, but it also provides fire-fighting, rescue services, fire mar- keting and inspections and response to hazardous materials incidents.

The department is served by a combination of more than 30 vol- untary fire fighters and full-time career firefighters/promoters. The department protects over 30,000 residents in an area that includes the village of Maryville and the St. Clair County fire protection district.
