College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

When you are the president of a college, you are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And you are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.

Dr. Almedro Romero Jr. Letters from Academia

College presidents worry about higher ed's future

One of the major responsibilities of college and university leaders is to look into the future and anticipate what's to come. They are supposed to see things coming, whether it's an economic downturn or a change in public sentiment. And they are always fretting about the prospects for higher education. These are not glamorous jobs, but they are important. It's like flipping through the pages of a book and trying to see what the next pages say.

President Trump and his recent interest in higher education is an example of how college leaders describe the state of race relations at their colleges and what they are doing to improve it.